I'm trying to mimic the constructor pattern while avoiding long parameter lists, and I figured I could get away with using function pointers in place of actual parameters. However, I can't seem to make the constructor call! class C { public: C(int i) { } }; static C* AllocatePtr1() { // allocate a C object } // called inside a function somewhere: void Fun() { C obj1 = AllocatePtr1(); } C* AllocatePtr2() { // allocate a C object } static void DeleterPtr() { // delete a C object } int main() { //... Fun(); //... } I realize that it will be a problem if a type that I'm allocating doesn't match my function pointer, but I have no way of checking that a type is compatible with a given function pointer without using template functions and dynamically determining the actual type needed. A: You can't. That doesn't make sense. You can get away with it for simple stuff, like having your functors be a subset of C, and then use SFINAE to check if the function pointer is a subtype of C, but that's still not using function pointers as they were meant to be used. A: There is no standard way to use a function pointer to generate an instance of a class.
