As regular readers know, I'm a big fan of the original 1992 film version of Bram Stoker's Dracula. And I'm a big fan of the artistic direction that they gave to the film. One of the most recognized artistic elements in this version of the film are the transparencies used throughout the film. From Van Helsing's original 19th century painting of Dracula that served as the inspiration for the film to the later transparencies to Stephanie Chase's signature, these elements of the film represent a very important element of the film in my eyes. The other thing I really liked about the 1992 film was the score. It was very much in line with the era of horror films and, of course, it was very dark. To bring the audience back from that horror-filled, dark setting, the composers behind the score for the film created music that was, as Rickram said, "brassy-brassy and a bit repetitious". I've always found the current score for the 2007 remake of the film rather pedestrian. I've never been a fan of the original choral score used during the film (and later the original score used in the 1992 film was never released on CD), and I didn't care for the way it was updated and updated and updated throughout the film. I actually enjoyed the exception to this rule that was the composer's stylistic interpretation of the Dracula theme (and, even though this version differs drastically from the original, I still like it). So imagine my excitement when I was informed that I'm to be the composer for a new audio play adaptation of the 1992 film version of Dracula. And what exactly is it that the audio play will be adapting? What is it that the audience is going to be seeing? What is it that the audience is going to be hearing? We'll have to wait and see what it is when the play itself premieres (or, if it premieres at the 2005 World Horror Convention, we'll have to wait until October to find out). But I'm already looking forward to hearing it in the theater and I'm happy that I'll be able to take that journey with the audience. Is it going to be a good play? I'm sure it will be a good play - it will be doing the script justice. But will it be enjoyable to listen to? That's the question that is on my mind right now, and I think that more than anything else will determine if the project
