Category:2007 albums Category:Film soundtracks Category:Pixar music Category:Michael Giacchino albums Category:Walt Disney Records soundtracksQ: Why is the size of UTF-8 encoded text not the same as a German character? I am currently developing an application that relies on UTF-8 encoding for text. Yet, when I have examples of text which are not correct German text, the size of them is not the same as the size of a German character. For example, "This is a test" in UTF-8 is the same as "Das ist ein test" in German (1 byte), but "This is a test" in standard Unicode is 5 bytes. As far as I know, UTF-8 encodes the characters with the smallest possible number of bytes while it encodes a German character with the same number of bytes as a Latin or Latin-1 character. Is there a technical reason why it is like that? A: UTF-8 is an encoding, not a character set. It represents Unicode text as a series of 8 bit values that are grouped into UTF-8 code units, roughly speaking. If you have a string of German text represented as UTF-8, it's quite possible that some of the code units are used to represent a "characters" in other parts of the Unicode repertoire, rather than in the German one. And of course, the German text happens to have one U+
