The following example explains how to get the name of a directory or file in UNIX or POSIX-compliant systems. The getwd() function returns the name of the directory that the process is currently in.

In order to use the Readme.txt file, you must create the file.

The create command creates a new file. As an example, the following command creates a file named

TestFile.txt, in a directory named

TestFiles: To learn how to choose the best resolution for a Digital Cinema Server, see Choosing a Resolution for Digital Cinema Servers. The `getwname()` function returns the name of the directory that the process is currently in. You use the `create`, `einfo`, `query`, `remove`, and `rename` commands to create, open, close, query, and remove information about files or directories. The names of information objects are strings. The source code and trace files are stored in the directory to which the build or install command adds output files. The following table lists the trace files. Create a table that contains all of the serial numbers in the system. This table is stored in the serialnumber.txt file. The readme.txt file contains the README.TXT file name, one or more blank lines, and additional information about the

SCM version of this book. The file name is not case-sensitive. This file is used by the installer to display the README.TXT file. The tracefiles folder contains the following information files: .Save & Email Overview 0cc13bf012
