We can define a number of user interface elements more comfortable for the user. The first element is the navigation. The navigation element in the traditional version of Photoshop was very straightforward. The user navigated between the toolbox items and the image, either by clicking on the item or by scrolling. The navigation in Adobe Photoshop is super convenient and concise. It provides the native experience that the user is familiar with. Also, the idea of using the easel and dragging and dropping objects on the canvas is very helpful. e3d0a04c9c

This code is run inside a loop. I am getting some errors is that there is a module not found error on min. Could someone let me know what is going on? import numpy as np import scipy.spatial.distance as dist def u(x,y,z): D = dist.euclidean(x,y,z) return D def min_distance(a, b): diff = u(a,b) md = dist.cdist(a,b,metric='euclidean') return min(diff, md) a = [1,2,3,4,5,6] b = [3,4,5,6,7,8] x_vals = [] y_vals = [] z_vals = [] for i in range(0, len(a)): x_vals.append(a[i]) y_vals.append(b[i]) z_vals.append(i) new_list = [] for i in range(0, len(a)): new_list.append(min_distance(a[i],b[i])) A: There are two errors in your code. The first and the most obvious is that you have a syntax error (x,y,z) when specifying either a list or tuples in a function definition. It should simply be a = [1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6]. After that, you have an indentation error with your for loop as a is used in both inside and outside the loop. It should be either indented more or copied inside the loop, as it is right now results in an error you cannot fix. You can fix this issue with a small modification to a function that accepts a tuple or list comprehension as parameter. def min_distance(a, b): [D for D in a[:len(b)] if D == b] # This single line is a D = dist.cdist(a,b,metric='euclidean') # alternative solution return min(D) With this change, you can add another short solution. You can simply return the output of the function instead of the function call. Note that there's a little bit of shuffling in this code, and you have to use the equality == instead of the is!= comparison, so when using a min function, you need to use the =, and not ==. But again, this is just a small change (omitting one line), so you do not need to worry about it: def min_distance(a, b): D = dist.
